Chris Register is a Returned Peace Corps Volunteer, former attorney, author, and journalist who ran for Congress in Virginia's 5th Congressional District. His career and life have been shaped by a commitment to public service and a desire to better understand the people and communities that make up America.

A Peace Corps Volunteer, Chris has carried the lessons of service throughout his professional life. As an attorney, author, and journalist, he has explored the challenges facing communities across the country. He has also traveled the entire United States by bicycle, using the journey to learn firsthand about the roots of America's problems as well as the people and ideas that offer hope for its future.

That experience led Chris to embrace public service as his calling. He campaigned on a vision of bridging America's political and cultural divides, strengthening democratic institutions, and building a government that is responsive to the people and the Constitution rather than partisan interests.

Chris lives in Charlottesville, Virginia, in the heart of the 5th Congressional District. He sees the district's deep connection to the nation's founding, including Monticello, Montpelier, and Highland, as a powerful reminder of both America's democratic ideals and the responsibility of each generation to renew them.
