Katherine Aleman is a public school teacher, small business owner, working mother of four, and former Norco City Council Member with a lifelong commitment to public service.

Raised on El Toro Marine Corps Base, Katherine is the daughter of a Marine helicopter pilot and an elementary school principal who instilled in her the values of service, faith, and hard work.

Following her family's tradition of service, Katherine joined the U.S. Peace Corps and served as a Volunteer in Paraguay. Her experience abroad gave her firsthand insight into the challenges communities face when government institutions fail to put people first—and deepened her commitment to public service and ensuring that every person has the opportunity to succeed.

After returning home, Katherine became a public school teacher in the Inland Empire, where she dedicated herself to helping students reach their full potential. While raising her four sons in Norco, known as "Horsetown USA," Katherine became involved in a neighborhood effort to address residents' concerns about zoning changes.

During her time on the Council, Katherine worked to increase transparency and public trust in local government, including advocating for open bidding on city contracts and keeping residents informed about the work of City Hall. She developed a reputation for working across party lines and bringing people together to solve problems.
